

Eat Drink

Piss Shit

Protest

How to feed a

protest

movement

Running a kitchen in the middle of a protest camp presents some unusual operational challenges. "We're cooking most of the hot food offsite at the moment," says George Coiley, as he leads me past boiling stove-top kettles, catering-sized saucepans and two volunteers preparing a fruit salad of epic proportions. "The police keep taking our stuff..."

This is Coiley's fourth Extinction Rebellion kitchen. Staffed by a rotating squad of around 30 volunteers, it serves food and hot drinks 24 hours a day to protesters and anyone else who needs it. All the food is vegan or vegetarian and is assembled from donations.